Titirangi has several walking-only trails through areas of dense plantings of native species. The most commonly used can be walked from Puhi Kai Iti/Cook Landing Site National Reserve to the brick plaza lookout, then the bush track parallel to Queen's Drive to the summit lookout over Tūranganui a Kiwa/Poverty Bay. This path includes a fitness trail. The downhill walk often follows the World War 2 Homeguard Track. The reserve's high points are popular for showing visitors the sights of the city, inner suburbs, port, beaches, rivers, fertile Gisborne Flats and bay. To the south is the land mass of Māhia Peninsula; to the east, open oceans.

TITIRANGI BUSH WALKS

Other attractive, interesting walks include tracks:

- from Puhi Kai Iti to Kaiti Beach around base of hill
- to Te Maro sculpture
- to World War 1 freezing workers monument
- off main track from Puhi Kai Iti to brick plaza lookout, including to a lookout over the port, and playground above Te Poho o Rawiri Marae.

Titirangi Reserve is a significant archaeological and cultural landscape, containing 14 recorded archaeological sites. The area has gradually been recloaked in native plants since 1990 thanks to the efforts of volunteers, school groups and other organisations. Gisborne District Council has progressively removed weed species, including pine trees, and planted native species on the maunga (hill). In partnership with Ngāti Oneone from 2018, the council began the Whaia Titirangi project to help further restore the maunga. This project, linked to Te Poho o Rawiri Marae as kaitiaki (guardians) of the maunga, has mainly been responsible for planting more than 70,000 native trees on the hill. Weed eradication and pest control continues.
